Gherkins - overview of the European Union market

Product description

HS 2001.10 Cucumber and gherkins prepared in vinegar or acetic acid.

Production

Most EU member countries have a substantial domestic production of gherkins, however, total production figures are not available. Germany, which is one of the largest markets, produces about 250,000 tons of canned gherkins per year. Producers in the EU use fresh or chilled gherkins grown locally or imported from neighboring countries, or preserved gherkins in brine or vinegar.

During the period 1988-1992, the total volume of imports increased by 41% while exports only increased by 10%. Germany was the largest importer of gherkins followed by France and the Netherlands. In recent years German imports of gherkins have almost doubled, mainly due to German reunification. The difference in the unit value of imports between France and other major importers suggests that France is importing a more expensive and higher quality variety of gherkins. With a total of 22,677 tons in 1992, Germany is by far the biggest EU exporter of gherkins, accounting for over 50% of the total volume of EU exports. Other large EU exporting countries are the Netherlands and the Belgium-Luxembourg Economic Union.

Main origins of imports

The main suppliers of gherkins to the EU are Turkey (29%), Germany (18%), the Netherlands (15%), Hungary (13%) and Morocco (8%). Other significant developing countries supplying gherkins are Bulgaria, Madagascar and Sri Lanka. (See statistical annex II for details). As can be seen from the graph below, Turkey replaced Morocco in 1990 as the leading supplier of gherkins to the EU and has seen a constant increase in its market share. Hungary, as one of the principal Eastern European suppliers, is emerging as a serious competitor.

Market characteristics

Gherkins, like other processed vegetables from the group of pickles, are mainly eaten together with meat and meat products, either as a side-dish or in sandwiches. Gherkins are available in different seasonings and sizes and reflect the variations in taste of European consumers. The German "Gurken", for example, are larger in size than the "cornichons" available in France and are also marketed in slices. The seasoning is "sweet-and-sour", whereas the gherkins sold in France usually do not contain any added sugar and are sold whole. There are six different sizes of gherkins available on the market, with the smaller sizes mostly available through retail outlets and the larger used in the food industry and the catering sector.

Number of whole gherkins per kg

40 - 45	120 - 130
60 - 70	180 - 200
90 - 100	250 - 300

Market access

Tariffs: The European Union applies the Common External Tariff (CET) rate which is 22% ad valorem. Under the Generalized System of Preferences (GSP), imports of gherkins from least developed countries (LDCs) are exempt from duties on the condition that consignments are accompanied by a certificate of origin. Imports from ACP and OCT countries (LOMAB) are also granted duty free access.

Sanitary regulations: So far, no common sanitary regulations are applied in the EU; however, member states have individual regulations with which all foodstuffs have to comply. Importers will provide such information as they are responsible for ensuring that food products meet the requirements of existing national food regulations. Food laws and regulations are in the process of being harmonized within the EU.

Prices

According to trade sources, wholesale prices in France for gherkins packed in tins containing 2,210 grams net weight were as follows:

Number	Price per kg (FF)	Number	Price per kg (FF)
40 - 45	20	120 - 130	32
60 - 70	23	180 - 200	40
90 - 100	29	250 - 300	n.a

The following graph, based on the unit value of imports, indicates the evolution of the import price for gherkins in major EU importing countries.

Graph 2: Evolution of unit values of EU imports between 1988 and 1992

Packaging

Gherkins are usually imported in barrels of 180 kg and tins of 5 kg. They are repackaged in glass jars for retail sale.

Sales promotion

The two major European trade fairs for food products - Anuga (Cologne, Germany) and SIAL (Paris, France) - are held biennially; see useful addresses for further information on these and other trade fairs.

Trade Channels

Imports of gherkins are usually handled by specialized importers of foodstuffs. A list of importers is given in annex I. Imported gherkins are channelled to the retail trade and the catering sector by specialized importers/packers, either direct or through wholesalers. The main retail outlets for gherkins are supermarkets and discount stores; others include groceries, delicatessens and specialty food shops.

Marker Prospects

Despite a stagnation of household expenditure due to current economic conditions in the EU, demand for gherkins is expected to grow but at a smaller rate. With price awareness increasing among consumers and the expansion of large retail organizations, competition is likely to become fiercer in the EU market. These developments can be seen as an opportunity for developing countries, which can provide an alternative to existing and established suppliers who have to cope with higher labor costs. However, delivery terms, particularly regular quality and supply, are essential in this market as imports generally undergo strict industrial processing. Prospects for developing countries seem also good for exporting "Cucumbers and gherkins, provisionally preserved but unsuitable in that state for immediate consumption" (HS 0711.40). In 1992 the EU imported ECU 7.6 million (13,389 tons) of this type of gherkins. Main EU importers were the United Kingdom, France and Germany. The largest supplier was Sri Lanka, followed by the Netherlands and Chile.

(a) Trade between members of the European Union is not reflected in 1993 data. As of January 1993, with the creation of the Single Market, the European Union introduced a new statistical procedure to collect data on intra-EU trade flows; the compilation of complete 1993 time series has thus been delayed.
